The Art of Writing Poetry	A Little	A few students wrote poems whose images were shaped by their study and research in the sciences, particularly in physics, astronomy, and biology, but their study in these fields over the course of this program was personal research, not part of the course structure. None the less, when scientific information was important to a particular poem or a particular poets work, it was discussed in workshop both by the poet and by others in class with knowledge of the subject matter. I would characterize such study as not general to the program, but rather related to the interests of particular students in the program, but I supported their research and use of information they were learning in their writing as much as I could given my own expertise. I might personally characterize that learning as very little for most students, but important to a few. I suggested research topics and books and people in the sciences who could answer questions that would help students in their writing about topics in the above listed fields.	X
