

Thinking for me began when I fell into a Philosophy class while searching for any Pre-Law major. Ironically, Symbolic Logic was yet another course for which there was “the right answer”, but it became the start of a glide path that turned questions inward.

Here began the Cartesian inquiry – “What’s real?” Followed by the Socratic “Why?” Leading inexorably to the ethical inquiry of good-bad-right-wrong, and ultimately, the unfathomable importance of life – all life.

From this sprang a vegetarian respect for animals, and a love of freedom of thought. And the daily experience of being a part of the effort of finite people to categorize and employ the infinite.

From Philosophy 120 to the courtroom, representing man in the interplay of mortal law and natural justice.
